Dereck Joubert wins Sixth Emmy for Outstanding Cinematography

This week in New York City, the Academy of Arts and Sciences honoured Dereck Joubert with an Emmy Award for cinematography at the 32nd annual Emmy Awards for News & Documentary. This is the Joubert's sixth Emmy and 10th nomination for their work with National Geographic and comes for their efforts on the series, "Great Migrations," zebra segment Race to Survive, shot in Botswana.

Dereck and Beverly accept the award in the name of Botswana and hope that the attention can go to thanking the country for protecting its wildlife in a way that allows the opportunity to not just film wildlife but for people around the world to then visit the country.

"It is an honour and great to be recognised by the most respected peer group in the industry, but this is shared with cameramen who contributed to the series and the editors and support crews that make it look good." says Dereck.

Of Botswana he says: "While big cats and other important wildlife populations in Africa collapse, Botswana represents the best hope we have for them enduring in the wild for a long time because of the government policies and a nation that takes that heritage seriously."
